"With the ever growing importance of vanadium, our Company is consolidating its leadership role as the definitive producer of high performance battery grade vanadium as well as vanadium electrolyte for the mass storage industry," stated Bill Radvak, President & CEO. "The change to American Vanadium Corp. signals the launch of an aggressive program to sign off-takes for the steel industry as well as forge global partnerships in the renewable energy space."

About American Vanadium Corp.

American Vanadium Corp. is a tier-one metals exploration and development company focused on developing environmentally favorable projects within politically stable regions with the potential to host large deposits of industrial metals or minerals. American Vanadium is currently developing a world-class vanadium resource in the State of Nevada, U.S.A., and evaluating other opportunities. The Company strives to be a premier mineral resource development and production company.

Vanadium is growing in importance as an alloying metal used to strengthen steel as well as the emerging uses with mass storage cells and lithium vanadium batteries for renewable energy. The Company's Gibellini Vanadium Project is unique in its ability to have economic production of vanadium for the steel industry as well as vanadium electrolyte for the mass storage industry. With virtually all world production of vanadium coming from China, South Africa and Russia, the Gibellini project, being located in Nevada, gives the Company the opportunity to become North America's first and only primary producer of Vanadium. Gibellini's favorable geologic setting and amenability to low cost heap leach recoveries offer unique low cost production capabilities.

A Scoping Study and NI 43-101 have been completed by AMEC E&C Services and are available at www.sedar.com or the Company's website www.americanvanadium.com.
