"The energy industry is being reshaped by digital and AI," said Rakesh Jaggi, president of SLB's digital business. "Working with industry leaders like Shell enables us to accelerate development of advanced digital and agentic AI solutions that are changing how our industry works through automation and autonomy to generate value right across upstream, from planning through operations."

The collaboration represents a long-standing relationship between the companies. Earlier this year, SLB announced a technical partnership to deploy its Petrel™ subsurface software across Shell's assets worldwide to standardize infrastructure and workflows and accelerate scalable digital solutions, helping to improve cost operating efficiencies. It will help inform Shell's digital strategy and technology roadmap, promote mutual learning to support Shell's broader digital transformation, and contribute to the development of digital solutions that are commercially viable and broadly applicable across the industry.
